New zoning finally OK'd for Bridal Veil Falls area

PROVO — The Utah County Commission has granted a zone change for the area encompassing Bridal Veil Falls, a change property owners have been seeking since last summer after announcing plans to give the area a $30,000 face lift.

The expansion, including construction of an amphitheater to seat about 300 people, has been on hold for months because the owners have been unable to get the zone change from "critical environmental" to "trades and services."

As previously zoned, the amphitheater was not allowed. Permits, however, were granted for power work and construction of a barbecue pit and a retaining wall.

Other plans include picnic tables, playground equipment, a trout pond and improvement of area trails. Owners say the expansion eventually could include improvements and facilities on 46 acres of canyon land skirting the Provo River.

By approving the zone change, county commissioners ruled against a county Planning Commission recommendation the zone not be changed. The Planning Commission ruled against the change twice, said Jeff Mendenhall of the county Planning Department, because completion of Provo Canyon Road expansion is some time away.

Mendenhall said the Planning Commission is not opposed to Bridal Veil Falls expansion plans, but the road is a liability and could not adequately handle increased traffic load. In addition, off-road parking in the area could create traffic and pedestrian hazards.

"We realize there are traffic concerns, but our feeling is that if we can convince you that we will do it right the problems won't necessarily be eliminated but will be mitigated," said Dave Gardner, planning consultant retained by Dave Grow, one of the owners. "We realize there are problems up there; we want to be part of the solutions."

Grow said an additional 100 cars or so generated by people driving to the amphitheater would have a negligible impact on the road. He said plans to double the seating capacity of Sundance Theater from 500 to 1,000 received enthusiastic support from the Planning Commission and when completed will draw much more traffic up the canyon than the proposed amphitheater.

Grow told commissioners 108 parking spaces will be provided about a quarter-mile south of the amphitheater, at Rotary Park south, of Provo Canyon Road. He said a shuttle service will eliminate pedestrian hazards and limit parking along the side of the road.

Thors Tenson, a Brigham Young University professor of recreational management, told county commissioners the amphitheater proposal "is a great thing for Utah Valley. I think we have a gold mine here."

He said Bridal Veil Falls is a major tourist attraction and offers the county an opportunity to grab a bigger share of Utah's $1.3 billion tourist industry. He said problems just need to be solved, and he encouraged commissioners to be creative in seeking solutions.

County Commissioner J. Oneil Miner said he favors the proposal, adding that the Utah Department of Transportation has dictated too long what the county do with its tax base and resources. He said people naturally want to park along the canyon road and it's time UDOT officials recognize that fact.

"It's a UDOT problem," he said. "They need to do something about it."

The Planning Commission still must approve architectural and landscaping plans for the amphitheater expansion before developers can finish it, but the facility likely will be ready sometime this spring.

Provo, state will split

PROVO — The state of Utah and Provo city have agreed to split the $420,800 cost of a flood-control project to help ease annual spring runoff out of Slate Canyon.

The proposal, tagged the Slate Canyon Phase I Flood Control Project, is the first part of a four-phase, $2.5 million plan to facilitate runoff waters from Slate Canyon retention basins to Utah Lake.

Extensive spring runoff last year forced the construction of a sandbag-lined river stretching dozens of blocks along Third South in Provo. City officials are hoping that such a last-minute emergency effort won't

In its regular session Tuesday, City Council authorized the $210,400 — the city's 50 percent match the state's funds to cover costs.

The state's participation was the state Board of Emergency Management's approval of the Phase I the matching funds arrangement reached such a decision Thursday.
